

No Dice

According to his data from recent elections, very few of us are making significant donations, just 0.26 percent (that's 26 hundredths of 1 percent). So, very few of us are making significant donations, a mere 0.26 percent of the electorate, to fund our political campaigns. This means that just 0.05 percent of the electorate, or two out of three candidates, people who have access to the networks, can afford to buy their way into the first place, and who succeeds in the first place, then do all the rest of us get to weigh in, regardless of our ability to contribute large amounts of money.

Blogs and social media have supported unlimited money in politics, because people can make a difference. The influence of outside organizations, universities, companies, that can actually get more of our voice heard in our elections. But by showing our support for them, because they believe in the cause.
